Rafael Nadal reflexiona sobre su derrota en Roland Garros y su posible retiro

Recientemente, Rafael Nadal sufrió una derrota en la primera ronda de Roland Garros, una derrota que podría marcar el final de su carrera. Sin embargo, Nadal se mostró optimista en la conferencia de prensa posterior al partido, afirmando que no se encontraba tan lejos de la victoria. Su actitud y comportamiento sugieren que cualquier decisión de retirarse será impulsada por su cuerpo, no por su mente.

Hace un mes, Nadal regresó a la competencia en Barcelona y Madrid con dudas sobre su participación en Roland Garros. Después de los múltiples problemas físicos a los que se ha enfrentado, incluidas varias cirugías y lesiones no relacionadas, sus expectativas eran bajas. Su objetivo era simplemente verificar si su cuerpo podía soportar la carga de competir al más alto nivel durante cinco sets. Su presencia en Roland Garros puede considerarse un paso adelante, ya que pudo desempeñarse decentemente en la cancha más importante de su carrera, hacer que la vida fuera incómoda para uno de los favoritos del torneo y partir sintiéndose en buena forma física.

Nadal cree que podría haber derrotado a muchos otros jugadores en el campo de este año, y un sorteo más favorable le habría brindado la oportunidad de construir su forma gradualmente. Sin embargo, Roland Garros llegó demasiado pronto en su recuperación y recibió un sorteo difícil, pero es más fácil aceptarlo que estar fuera del juego sin esperanza de progresar.

"No sé si estaré o no estaré [listo] en un mes y medio, porque mi cuerpo ha sido una jungla durante dos años. No sabes qué esperar. Despierto un día y encuentro una serpiente mordiéndome. Otro día, un tigre", dijo Nadal, sonriendo. "[Ha] sido una gran lucha con todas las cosas que he pasado, ¿no? Pero la dinámica es positiva en las últimas semanas. Me sentí listo. Creo que mañana estaré listo para jugar de nuevo si tengo que hacerlo. Pero no tendré que hacerlo."
